

Capital Ships For The Royal Navy Are Necessary To Maintain Freedom Of The Seas

(By "Editor," well-known British writer on Naval Affairs in London, England.)

WHEN Mr. A. Alexander introduced the Navy estimates in the House of Commons, the First Lord emphasized that despite the atomic bomb and the explosion of our naval power, the Royal Navy has destroyed the need for navies, the freedom and standard of life of the related peoples of the British Commonwealth still depend upon the inviolability of the sea. This is because, while the Royal Navy has no power and upon air power over the sea.

It is within living memory that the Royal Navy has never suffered defeat at the hands of an enemy who did not destroy the command and control of our sea power. The Royal Navy has never been defeated in any of its operations, and it is the only navy in the world which has never been defeated in any of its operations. The Royal Navy has never been defeated in any of its operations, and it is the only navy in the world which has never been defeated in any of its operations.

Never again, said the First Lord, will we run the risk of unpreparedness. We are now in a position to meet any emergency. We are now in a position to meet any emergency. We are now in a position to meet any emergency. We are now in a position to meet any emergency.

It is possible that an attack will be made on the atomic bomb. It is possible that an attack will be made on the atomic bomb. It is possible that an attack will be made on the atomic bomb. It is possible that an attack will be made on the atomic bomb.

From across the war, Mr. Percy Smith was demanding, "What is the use of battlements? What is the use of battlements? What is the use of battlements? What is the use of battlements?"

Today, our present-day battlements are not afloat. Today, our present-day battlements are not afloat. Today, our present-day battlements are not afloat. Today, our present-day battlements are not afloat.
